Excerpt: . . . and looking into their faces asked: Am I much needed But before the answer came, he saw there was no apprehension expressed in their manner, and so smilingly turned to Alice, who introduced him to Mr. Packard. Claudius then observing that Mary was absent, allowing his face again to assume its serious expression, inquired: Is it possible that Miss Radcliffe is my patient Oh! no, it is Felix, said Alice, Mary has gone to tell Mrs. Bobbins you are coming. Mrs. Radcliffe then led the way to Felix's room. Felix had not forgotten the doctor; but as is common among children, an absence of forty days had made a greater difference than years, with older people. There was no display of affection on either side. A physical examination, supplemented by a few questions to Mrs. Bobbins, satisfied the doctor that there was nothing but a functional disturbance, producing melancholy, and due to an excess of sweet food; a common error in warm weather. Mary, after seeing Mrs. Kobbins, went directly to the parlor, where, by herself, she sat looking out of the window; and where her mother and the doctor observed her on their return. Mrs. Radcliffe, with the natural tact of her sex, immediately perceived an opportunity and embraced it, saying: Doctor, you will please excuse me for a few minutes, I will return; for I wish to ask several questions and make note of your instructions, concerning baby's diet. Quickly departing, she...
